Protecting Rural Spaces, Creating Urban Places

Albemarle County is an attractive, desirable place for people to live for many reasons. The County enjoys a strong economy, excellent services, an attractive setting, and convenience to numerous nearby attractions. Our community is very visible and in demand as we can see by Albemarle's continued growth rate of approximately 1.8%, or almost 1600 new residents every year.

These residents bring new energy and vitality to the County, but also create challenges in housing, traffic congestion and other growth impacts. Over time, the County has developed a very specific and focused approach to growth management that aims to keep development pressure from destroying the rural areas that our residents value so dearly.

Our growth management plan outlines a clear vision of high quality urban areas accommodating most of the anticipated growth in the County and rural areas preserved for resource conservation and protection purposes. The defined urban areas and rural areas have very distinct levels of service and development potential. Public services such as police, fire and rescue protection, public utilities such as water and sewer, and public facilities like roads and sidewalks, are provided at a much higher level in the urban areas.

The success of our rural protection efforts depends on our ability to concentrate growth, including new homes and businesses, in our established urban areas where these services, utilities and facilities can serve the largest number of citizens. To learn more about the County's rural spaces and urban places, and the impacts of our growth management strategies on your home and neighborhood, please visit the Community Development website: <http://www.albemarle.org/planning>.
